The epidermal basement membrane of the regenerating rat tail is replaced within 10 days following hair removal. The rate of turnover of the major proteins was investigated using in vivo and in vitro methods. In vivo, pulse-chase experiments were performed to examine the turnover of the extracellular matrix proteins laminin, type IV collagen, and the laminin receptor, entactin. In vitro, the disassembly and reassembly of basement membrane was investigated using a methylcellulose overlay system. It was found that the rate of removal of laminin from the basement membrane during normal epidermal wound healing was much slower than that found for type IV collagen and entactin. Increased disassembly of the basement membrane was observed during the regenerative response following removal of the dorsal hair on the tail.A novel technique to correct asymmetry caused by grafting of facial tissues. A novel technique has been introduced to overcome the functional and cosmetic problems caused by grafting of facial tissues. This technique allows reshaping of the donor bed, transfer of facial tissue to the homologous site, and final effect of tissue grafting to the recipient site using a three-way concept: so-called, the profile change. To demonstrate the application of this technique, we grafted a 5 x 1 cm graft of skin from the forehead and a 1 x 1 cm graft of skin from the donor cheek to the right eyebrow and a 1 x 1 cm graft of skin from the donor cheek to the left brow, on the right side of a patient's face. These grafts were fixed with 5-0 silk sutures to form triangles and the cephalic side of the triangles was grafted to the right eyebrow. On day 2 after the operation, the donor sites showed significant hematoma with local swelling. On day 7, the nasolabial folds on the right side of the face became horizontal. On day 14, the donor site and the right side of the face showed atrophy. On day 21, in the donor site, volume loss and skin color were still observed, which gradually increased. On day 42, the donor site was hidden by the left side of the face. Final results were less asymmetry
