--r9.html.Q: How to call type constructors in F#? Could someone please explain how I can call the following type constructors in F#: type FooType() = abstract member DoStuff() type BarType() = abstract member DoBar() I would like to have a function that looks like this: let x() = FooType().DoStuff() The following line does not compile: type BarType() = abstract member DoBar() : unit -> FooType() A: You have to use a unit -> FooType() function. This is called a method that takes a unit as argument and has the type FooType as result. The usage of F# is quite similar to most other languages; you need to declare a function or member function. type FooType() = abstract member DoStuff() abstract member DoBar(): unit -> FooType()

Let's examine what this does: FooType is the name of a type The first constructor has the type abstract member DoStuff and no other constructors. DoStuff is a method that takes a unit parameter and has a result type FooType.

DoBar is a function that takes a unit and returns a FooType. A: The syntax is not very different from C#. You declare abstract classes without constructors. You then provide an abstract method with a matching non-nullary function. It's just a function. type FooType() = abstract DoStuff() type BarType() = abstract DoBar() let x() = FooType().DoStuff() let y() = BarType().DoBar() Now that you're aware of abstract classes and methods, you can use them and decide whether to use them later or not. For example, you might decide to make DoStuff abstract and decide to make DoBar an instance method on FooType. Q: Match the drop down of a table element with options I have code which looks like
